The History Of The Red Army (PBS America, 8.35pm) This timely French-made film charts the Red Army's fortunes from victory in 1945 to its demise (along with the Soviet Union's) in 1991: useful for running the space programme and crushing rebel regimes in Hungary and Czechoslovakia, but otherwise out of favour, underfunded and viewed with suspicion by politicians throughout the Cold War. An excellent but all-too-brief final section covers the war in Afghanistan (1979-89), a Vietnam-like disaster where "all the Red Army's failings were exaggerated". Given its domestic repercussions and striking echoes of the invasion of Ukraine, this conflict deserves a documentary, or even series, of its own. John Dugdale

The Jubilee Pudding 70 Years In The Baking (BBC1, 8pm) It's the Greatest British Bake-Off, as five home cooks, their recipes chosen from 5,000 entries, are challenged to create a new dessert fit for the Queen. Judge Dame Mary Berry is hopeful the recipe will take its place among the regal foodstuff pantheon that includes coronation chicken and Victoria sponge and will be found on Union Jack-bedecked trestle tables at platinum jubilee street parties. So, no pressure on finalists Kathryn, Jemma, Sam, Shabnam and Susan: they need only create a cake that is traditional yet modern, and that anyone can make at home but still be a showstopper. Seat At The Table Let's Talk About Climate Anxiety (YouTube) Climate activist Jack Harries presents a two-part look at how the threat of environmental doom is affecting the mental health of young people. He speaks to those who suffer from climate anxiety, as well as to experts who suggest positive steps for change.

Secrets Of The London Underground (Yesterday, 8pm) How can you not warm to presenters thrilled by an old Network SouthEast logo or the chance to stand on the wrong side of an escalator? Tim Dunn and Siddie Holloway are cheery guides to this deep dive into the Waterloo & City line and the Underground's archives.

Art That Made Us (BBC2, 9pm) In a cloud of steam, this fine series pulls into the Victorian city to examine the effects the industrial age had on art. JMW Turner, William Morris, Oscar Wilde and Walter Sickert are vividly analysed, while Maxine Peake talks about Elizabeth Gaskell's North and South. Victoria Segal
